Cost Accounting Blocher Solution Manual Chapter 12

To make matters worse, these benefits, more often than not, are longterm in nature, and the firm will see no immediate tangible results. A large confectionery firm rejected an automated storage and distribution facility because it did not include the benefits that better customer services would bring. Better customer services often lead to higher sales volume and market share and, eventually, higher profits. Realizing these difficulties, middle managers of a kitchen unit manufacturer, with an established reputation for innovative design, forced an investment in computerassisted design equipment by exaggerating financial benefits—a practice that should be discouraged and disallowed. Appraisals of investments in advanced manufacturing technology need to be evaluated in terms of quantitative analysis and strategic consideration. Advanced manufacturing technology can expand the firm's product portfolio, enhance corporate image, and increase manufacturing flexibility, in addition to potentially decreasing production time and costs. Firms need to assess both the quantifiable shortterm incremental cash inflows and the longrun strategic benefits in judging an investment's merits. In addition to cashflow analysis, an investment proposal can go a long way if it also includes the investment's strategic benefits. A firm manufacturing highpressure casings decided to convert its manufacturing operations to cell manufacturing. The firm enjoyed such unplanned benefits as a 50 percent reduction in inventory, a 75 percent improvement in quality, substantial reduction in lead times, and flexible machining with overall labor reduction. The firm's original expectations included reduced lead time in the drawing office and reduced number of employees and WIP inventory. The additional benefits offered more accurate and timely transfer of data that greatly improved the firm's competitive edge and propelled the firm into a new marketing position. <http://3-peaksleadership.com/admin/uploads/fluid-mechanics-lab-manual-book.xml>

Solutions to Review Questions. Accounting assigns costs and revenues to "responsibility centers" that correspond to the decision authority of managers.

This allows the firm to measure performance based on the results of decisions by the manager. An effective corporate cost allocation system separates the results of decisions by corporate managers from those of business unit managers. Although there are well-developed standards for many accounting transactions, accounting decisions still depend on the judgment of managers. There are also many estimates for example, the depreciable lives of fixed assets that are subject to managerial discretion. No entirely satisfactory and unique solution is readily determinable. The allocation method affects the costs and profits in a profit center of the different units. If a manager's compensation depends on costs or profits, he or she will have an interest in showing as good performance as possible.

This means that although one allocation method led to better performance as measured in one unit, a different allocation method will likely show better performance in the new unit. Large divisions are, all other things being equal, more likely to rank in the upper half. Hence, a large division manager would tend to receive a bonus with performance that is just barely above the cost of capital whereas a smaller division might need to earn a return far in excess of the cost of capital in order to earn a bonus. The approach used also does not take into account differences in capital charges that might be appropriate for different divisions. Although there is no explicit bonus, better performance is likely to lead to greater chances for promotion and higher salary. Answers will vary. There are many reasons for pay not to reflect performance. In some cases, the reasons are because of collusion or other unethical or illegal reasons. Table of Contents.
