Remove also the sump plate and gauze from the base of the crankcase, which is retained by four small nuts and washers. This will permit all excess oil to drain from the crankcase. Remove the cutout lead from the end cover of the magneto. Remove the chain guard over the final drive chain and the chain itself, by withdrawing the spring link unit construction models only.

The engine of the swinging arm models is retained in the frame by four bolts, two of which pass through the front engine plates and two through the rear. When these bolts are withdrawn, the engine can be lifted forward and upward until it is clear of the frame. Later models will have metal cases that surround the dynamo still in position. Special care is necessary to prevent the dynamo clamp from fouling the right hand frame tube during the lifting out operation. If they are wearing thin or unequally, they must be replaced. When they are clear of the brake plate the return springs should be removed and the shoes replaced. It is possible to replace the brake linings fitted with rivets and not bonded on, as is the current practice. Much will depend on the availability of the original type of linings; service exchange brake shoes with bonded on linings may be the only practical form of replacement. If new linings are fitted by riveting, it is important that the rivet heads are countersunk, otherwise they will rub on the brake drum and be dangerous. Finish off by chamfering off the end of each shoe, otherwise fierce brake grab may occur due to the pickup of the leading edge of each lining. Before replacing the brake shoes, check that the brake operating cam can be removed for greasing by unscrewing the nut on the end of the brake operating arm and drawing the arm off so that the cam spindle can be withdrawn from the inside of the brake plate. Even gives measurements for a engine rebuild jig.
